I graduated in Contemporary History at the University of Trieste, and I obtained a Ph.D. in "History of European Society" at the University of Pavia. I collaborated as a researcher with universities and cultural institutions, developing some projects concerning the economic and social history of Venezia Giulia region. I have taught economic history at the University of Trieste (2001-2008), and since December 2008 I have been a lecturer of economic history at the University of Milan-Bicocca, confirmed since 2011.

My interests of research concern maritime history, from the midNineteenth century to the present age, the history of transport, shipbuilding, infrastructure and, in general, the social and entrepreneurial history of contemporary Europe from the nineteenth century onwards. More recently, I began to deal with the history of globalization and international trade, with particular regard to the evolution of long-distance commercial mobility systems. Some of my published work are available at academia.edu and researchgate websites.
